

CHAPTER 19

Pajaro Dunes

Pajaro Dunes is a collection of beachfront condominiums and houses located on Monterey Bay.

It was our beach location with the family after we moved to the West Coast. It has several miles of beautiful sandy beach and multiple homes that we could rent for a week in the summer.

It is about one hour's drive south of San Francisco and members of the family that had jobs in San Francisco found not too far away.

In December 2002, we were quite a family group and the kids were old enough to where they could enjoy the beach.

Pajaro Dunes is basically about the beach, so we start with some pictures from August 2003 on the beach. Pete encouraging Jimi and Joey to test the waves. the boys seem more interested in showing sand crabs to Maxwell.

Sheila takes Maxwell to the waves and Sheila and Ryan check out the sand.

Devin is also testing the sand.

Pete and I are checking out the winds for flying a couple of Pete's kites.

Indoors, Georgia, Devon, and Maxwell seem to be testing some new food.

We stopped on the way home to check out the roaring camp and big trees narrow gauge railroad. It was a good summer vacation in 2002.

The ladies were fairly stress free.

M a x w e l l
displayed his interest in building. I don't have an early picture of Georgia's art, this is a much later Georgia photo.

In September my sister, Mary, her husband Ken, their son Dick and daughter-in-law Susan stopped in to see us in our San Jacinto house in San Francisco. It was a quick visit but enjoyable.

This was not the first year that we were at Pajaro Dunes, but it was the first year that I saved photographs. We rented different cabins each year for about three years before this.